By order of the Board.

EMMONS CLARK,
Secretary.

HEALTH DEPARTMENT OF THE CITY OF NEW YORK, BUREAU OF VITAL STATISTICS, October 20, 1874.

To the Secretary of the Board of Health:

SIR—In the week that ended on Saturday, the 17th inst., there were 554 deaths reported in the city. There were 510 deaths in the previous week. The increase occurred in diseases classed as zymotic and constitutional. The chief increase was in deaths by diphtheria, which caused 46 deaths; in small-pox, which caused 17; in phthisis, which caused 93; and in pneumonia and bronchitis, with 46 deaths.

The temperature was cooler than in the previous week, the mean being 58.4 and 51.4 degrees in the respective weeks.

The mortality in the week ending on the 10th of October, was equal to 25.50 in the 1,000 inhabitants annually. This is higher than the average death-rate for the corresponding week in the past five years. This increased mortality is found to be mainly from diphtheria and from maladies of infants and young children. The widespread prevalence of diphtheria in densely populated dwellings is more marked than ever before, and especially among classes of families in which the separate care of the sick and the disinfection and purification of clothing and apartments, are difficult and can seldom be as thorough as the case requires, this disease tends to perpetuate itself and do the utmost injury.

Respectfully submitted.

ELISHA HARRIS, M. D.,
Registrar of Vital Statistics.

HEALTH DEPARTMENT OF THE CITY OF NEW YORK, NEW YORK, October 1, 1874.

Suggestions for a sanitary inspection of the eyes of children in public schools, and asylums, for the detection and prevention of contagious diseases of the eye and of progressive short-sightedness.

Impairment of sight to any serious extent or inability to use the eyes freely, are, of course, two of the greatest afflictions that can befall the working man. They necessarily unfit him for almost any occupation, and are, as a matter of fact, most fruitful causes of pauperism. The prevention as far as possible of diseases dangerous to eyesight should therefore claim the most serious attention of the Board of Health; and, in the opinion of the writer, a vast deal in the way of such prevention among the poorer classes is perfectly feasible, and from the prevalence of serious eye diseases among this class of the population, steps in this direction are urgently demanded.

Among the lower classes the most frequent forms of eye diseases affecting the sight or the free use of the eyes, are the various forms of ophthalmia and "granular lids." That these diseases are more prevalent among the lower than the higher classes is largely due to defective hygiene with the former, but this prevalence is also the result, to a very great extent, of direct contagion. It is an every-day experience with ophthalmic surgeons to meet with these diseases spreading from one case through a family, a tenement house, a school, an asylum, or a barrack; and that they are directly contagious from eye to eye through the medium of the fingers, clothing, etc., is a proven fact. Now these diseases prevail largely among children, and from the difficulty of regulating the intercourse among children, contagion is more frequent with them than with adults. Schools and asylums, therefore, where large numbers of children are brought together, are exactly the places where contagion is most rife: such institutions, in fact, in spite of careful management, being veritable hot-beds for the growth and dissemination of this class of disease. Inasmuch, therefore, as our public schools and asylums are under the sanitary jurisdiction of the health authorities, it is claimed that the latter have it in their power to easily stop this evil, by instituting systematic inspections of the eyes of all inmates of these institutions, and requiring the prompt discharge or complete isolation of any child found afflicted with contagious disease of the eyes. Such inspections must be made by the physician, because, in the earlier stages of many forms of the diseases in question, their existence cannot be detected except by an examination of the inner surfaces of the eyelids. The inspections are perfectly feasible—could be rapidly made on the spot, in the school or asylum, and scores of future useful citizens thus saved to the State, who would otherwise grow up to be burdens on their relatives, or actual paupers to be supported by the tax-payers.

Another formidable eye disease, also amenable to prevention in a large degree by sanitary regulations, is short sightedness—myopia, in its severe form. The condition of "near sight" is in a large proportion of cases a concomitant of an actual disease of the deeper parts of the eye; and though in its slighter degrees it is a comparatively innocent affection—the error of sight being remedied by glasses; yet when beginning in childhood and allowed to run unchecked, the disease too readily assumes a severe type, producing not only an extreme degree of near-sightedness, but permanently impairing the eyesight in addition. Persons so affected are often unable to perform any kind of skilled labor requiring accurate eyesight, and such eyes are always in a dangerously susceptible state, being prone to the development of other diseases which often destroy what remnants of useful sight are left by the original affection.

Now, the seeds of "progressive myopia" are laid in childhood, and its determining cause is, in some way or another, an over-taxation of the eyes. No exact definition of what constitutes such an over-taxation can be given, for some eyes are more predisposed to myopia than others, so that what would be safe work for one individual would be injurious to another. But in a general way the following have been found to be determining causes for the development of myopia, and they are manifestly conditions that obtain largely in schools, and that are amendable to sanitary regulations: 1. Prolonged continuous use of the eyes for near work, as in reading and writing. 2. Bad or insufficient light to work by. 3. Too great fineness or indistinctness of the objects to be worked at, requiring an effort for the eyes to see properly; as is the case with finely or badly printed books. 4. Badly made desks or work-tables, requiring the occupant to stoop over the work, and fostering the habit common with children of bringing the eyes unnecessarily and improperly near to the objects looked at.

That these alleged causes do really lead to the development of myopia, and that the importance of taking steps to prevent its occurrence among children is not over estimated, are shown by the following fact: The Prussian government, finding the great prevalence of myopia to actually reduce the number of its subjects available for recruits for the army, has recognized the origin of the disease in schools, and has already done exactly what it is hoped may ultimately be done here, viz., has enforced such regulations for the construction of public school-rooms as regards lighting, and for the shape and size of desks for children of different ages as have been recommended by authorized physicians in accordance with the results of an examination of the eyes of school children for myopia. Facts and statistics on this head can be easily obtained.

It is, therefore, urged that the inspection of the eyes of school children be made to include the testing them for myopia: partly for the detection of individual cases of the disease at a stage when its further progress could be stopped; but, also, more especially, for a general study of the prevalence of myopia in our schools, and of the relative influence of its various determining causes, with a view of deciding what steps would be advisable for the prevention of any dangerous prevalence of the disease in any or all of our schools.

Finally, the making of such inspections as are here suggested, is urged for the further reason that they are quickly and easily made; entail little or no annoyance upon scholars or teachers, and from the nature of the case, would not be opposed by the community at large.

Consulting Microscopist to the Board of Health,
